Delegation: Spain

Commission: tourism

Spain's economy depends heavily on tourism, which also creates jobs, grows GDP, and promotes regional development. Blessed with a varied terrain, an abundant cultural legacy, and a pleasant climate, Spain has long been a popular travel destination for tourists from throughout the world. But as tourism expands quickly, there is an increasing need to make sure it remains sustainable by striking a balance between economic expansion and the protection of the environment, social justice, and cultural heritage.

Spain is dedicated to encouraging environmentally friendly tourism activities that protect the environment, preserve natural resources, and show respect for regional customs and communities. This include encouraging the use of environmentally friendly lodging, responsible travel, sustainable modes of transportation and developing sustainable touristic activities .

Spain understands the value of funding environmentally friendly transportation networks, waste management programs, renewable energy projects, and water conservation efforts. The visitor experience may be improved and the carbon footprint of tourism activities can be decreased by giving investments in eco-friendly infrastructure top priority.

Spain understands the value of expanding its tourism portfolio to include cultural tourism, and heritage tourism in addition to the typical sun and beach attractions. By exhibiting the nation's varied topography and rich cultural legacy, we can more fairly disperse visitor traffic and ease the burden on congested regions.

The country of Spain doesn't believe reducing tourism influx is the right choice but further encouraging a more sustainable tourism and dispersing the touristic interest across the country in the near future is the better option.
